The Continuation and Concluſion of the ABRIDGMENT of a ſhort Treatiſe publiſhed in 1669, intitled, The Children's Petition, or A modeſt Remonſtrance of that intolerable grievance our Youth lie under, in the accuſtomed Severities of the School-diſcipline of this Nation: humbly preſented to the conſideration of the Parliament.

IT is a thing here worth the enquiry, what that power the Maſter hath over his Scholars is, and whence he hath it. All power is either natural, or derived. The power of the Maſter is not of Nature: for what hath one man of himſelf to do with the Child of another? The power which is derived, is either ſupream, or ſubordinate. The power of the Maſter is of the latter kind, being that right of ruling the Scholar, which is given him by the Father. It is no power therefore ſupream, but ſubordinate; and not natural, but derived from that which is natural; and conſequently is no other, nor no more, or to any other purpoſe, than what the Parents do allow him. If a Father therefore ſhall commit his Child to a ſchool for learning, but ſhall not give the Maſter leave to ſtrike him, or yet not to uſe this ſort of coercion upon him for the reaſons mentioned, the Maſter cannot ſerve any ſuch Child in this faſhion, without being unjuſt, and exerciſing an authority over him which he has not.

'Not that we intend by this to diminiſh the leaſt tittle of that reverence which is due to our Maſters. For when we derive their authority from our Parents, we think it a part of the piety we owe to God and our Parents, to render honour to the perſons of our Maſters, and obedience to their inſtructions. It is our Parents, we know, from whom we derive our being in the world; and it is our Maſters many times to whom we owe our more happy being, in regard of that ſhape and faſhion wherein they caſt us for the ſerving our generation, or living more to purpoſe in it. There is not therefore any veneration or gratitude we can pay them, nor any gifts or gratuities they can receive from our Friends, which we think too much for their care and labour in the faithful diſcharge of their duty towards us. But there is a certain payment which they give, and not receive, whereof we crave an abatement; and about which, as neither worthy, nor innocent, or at leaſt whether it be ſo or no, according to the common uſage of it, we are willing to come to ſome account or argument with them.

'One Boy hath happily a good underſtand and no memory; another hath a ready memory and no judgment; a third hath neither memory, nor judgment. The Boy whoſe memory is quick, looks over his leſſon once or twice, and goes to play; the other two ply their book as hard as they can, and are not able to get it. The Maſter comes now and puts the Boy who follows his play, to ſay his Part; he ſays it, and ſo paſſes: the other two cannot ſay for their lives, and are beaten. Here is Nature in theſe lads, and no fault puniſhed. If the Boy who has the memory, had been put on ſome other task requiring pains and judgment, he would have ſuffered, and one of the other eſcaped. Thus Fortune, not deſert, is encouraged, or reproved. And what if the Maſter, who knows the difference of their abilities, ſhall purpoſely ſet each of them to ſuch tasks, unto which he knows their parts moſt defective?

'Let us yet preſs this a little farther. It is the cuſtom of ſome ſchools, or rather of ſome Maſters, to ſet their Boys a law, That if we miſs ſuch a number of words, as ſuppoſe juſt three, we muſt be certain of what follows: and herein muſt they appear very righteous men to us, that they impartially execute their own rule, and ſpare none. Now what unreaſonable dealings are theſe? For one Boy to anſwer but three words in the whole, and miſs all the reſt, is more than for another to anſwer all the reſt, and miſs but three words. What is it whether a Boy miſs three words, or thirteen? It is his care or negligence, his diligence or diſobedience is to be regarded. It is the will and endeavour which alone renders him culpable or blameleſs.

'When one ſees a child more pretty, and ingenious than others, and upon this account ſeemingly more liked by his Maſter, one would be apt to think, that ſurely he would be loth to whip ſuch a boy. But when we that go to ſchool ſee this lad frequently taken out, and have about half a dozen, or half a ſcore laſhes given him, by authority of that ſentence, Non caſtigo te quòd odio habeam, ſed quòd amem, rung in his ear, with repetition of the quòd amem. at every laſh; what ſhall we think of ſuch liking? When theſe laſhes farther ſhall be with a weapon of that length and ſharpneſs, that the Boy ſhall be made ſo raw, as not to be able to ſit down; what ſhall we think of theſe quòd amems, in the laſher's mouth? And what if the reaſon be enquired for this, and there be nothing found, but a head perhaps uncomb'd, a band not put on right, a pair of ſtockings down at knees, a word or two miſſing in his Part, &c. Certainly if this be the effect of the Maſter's greater affection, how well were it to be rather the object of his hatred? —— Let dogs be beaten, to teach them to crouch, or lie down: but let Children be inſtructed in learning of their books, by ſuch means as are ſuteable to creatures endued with underſtanding, and with thoſe ſeeds of reaſon which are ſprouting out, and ought to be ſuckled with tender cultivation. It is a prepoſterous courſe, doubtleſs, that Children ſhould be, as it were, ſuppoſed all born mad, and ſo ſent to ſchool onely as to Bedlam, to be made ſober by cruel handling.

'The training up of Children to virtue and good literature is, beyond doubt, a noble thing in its own nature, and might be an employment of grandeur, for the moſt nobly born and qualified, the moſt generous minds, and braveſt ſpirits; and none elſe ſhould be admitted to ſo excellent a ſervice for the Commonwealth, were it not that theſe barbarous cuſtoms, received of ſome degenerate Nations (in ſo ſilly methods of teaching, and this ſordid way of puniſhing) have diſhonoured the Profeſſion, and rendered the Schoolmaſter's office no more hallowed than that of the Roman Lictor, or Beadle in other Nations. Not but there have been ſome Maſters of that ingenuity and modeſty, as they could never once find in their hearts to uſe this ſort of puniſhment; not but there are ſome others who have taken up the common uſage without reflexion, and their hearts cannot reproach them, that they have ever exerciſed it from any inſtigation whereof they ſhould be aſhamed, but onely out of righteouſneſs for their ſcholars ſake, in the amendment of their manners, or quickning them in their books.

'There are ſeveral abilities muſt go to make a man a perfect faculty to breed up Scholars; among the which, theſe two are the chiefeſt, a temperate mind, and unwearied diligence. That perſon, who by ſweetneſs and gentleneſs, or by the gravity of his deportment and countenance; or elſe by prudence and contrivance, is not able to awe and keep a company of Youth in obedience, without violence and ſtripes, ſhould judge himſelf no more fit for that function, than if he had no skill in the Latin and Greek; and ſuch ſhould never be admitted to this charge, by thoſe who have the nomination or election. For when we ſhould have it look'd upon as a dignity, or a matter of honour, (as really it is) like the being ſent into a Province, for a man to be eſteemed ſo prudent, ſo vertuous, ſo worthy as to be choſen Præfect of the Children of a Town, in his admittance into a publick ſchool, and made ruler over a hundred, over fifties, and over tens; we cannot but deſire, that thing may be ſuffered no longer, which does bring it in diſhonour.

'Our Schools, we know, in Latin are called Ludi, Ludi literarii, and our Maſters, Ludi Magiſtri. From hence we may take the indication, that the erudition of children, among the wiſer Antients, was thought beſt to be carried on in the way of ſport and exerciſe. As the young men went to their Games to get the garland in the exerciſe of their ſtrength, the Children were to go to their books to exerciſe their wits. There would be no need of the Parent's ſolicitude, or the Maſter's ſtripes, to bring the child to his learning; if the methods of it were caſt into that mould, as ſhould make all their leſſons appear only as ſo many plays and recreations, from which they ſhould be kept oftentimes as by the reins, to raiſe their minds into more earneſtneſs, rather than be ſpurred, as we are commonly, and galled only to the ſame. Let the Boys be ſet a running, as it were, with one another, in getting without book; let them be ſet a wreſtling, in conſtruing and parſing; let them, in the whole buſineſs of the ſchool, be chearfully ſtriving with themſelves and fellows in underſtanding, who ſhall excell, and wear the wreath of their Maſter's commendation. If any Boy ſhall be negligent, or do unworthily, let him be turned out of the ſchool, amongſt thoſe rude and illiterate Boys who are no ſcholars; being made to account ſo heavily of that, as to know his total excluſion were indeed the extreameſt puniſhment. But if any are diligent, and deſerve encouragement, let them not only be admitted to higher degrees of exerciſe, but to ſome more intimate converſe of their Maſter in reading of Hiſtory, or other delightful ſtudies; which he ſhould ſo illuſtrate and apply, as may both tend to their progreſs in knowledge, and faſhioning their ſpirits to honour and virtue. It is not the boy's warm bed, or breakfaſt, not his meat and drink, no not his ball, his top, and his bandy, would be ſo delicious to him, as the time he was thus ſuffered to be with his Maſter; if our Schools were but ſo ordered, as every where they ſhould be, that the matters there performed were made to become in effect onely the Boys Olympicks, or ſo many Games of the Muſes, unto which they had recourſe for their delight and glory.

'Not that when we write this, it may be ever expected any thing in this world ſhould immediately be perfect. There will be ſome Maſters, and ſome Boys bad enough; and there may be ſome faults, which not onely deſerve, but are fit to receive exemplary correction. Let that chaſtiſement therefore, which is tolerated in our Schools, have an ingenuous adminiſtration. Let no child at any time be puniſhed in the Maſter's heat or paſſion; if it be a fault now, it will be ſo an hour hence; if it appear not a crime to morrow, it was not ſo heinous as he thought it to be yeſterday. Let the Boy then undergo a ſolemn kind of judicature; if it were by a form of the ſame Boys as aſſeſſors together with their Maſter, it were but like the Lacedemonian inſtitution of their youth, whereof the chief point lay in this, To enable them to judge aright of the good and evil, or of what was praiſe-worthy, and what to be condemned, in human converſation. Whatſoever the Criminal can alledge for himſelf, by way of juſtification, or extenuation of his fact, it ought to be heard both with patience and candour. If his fault may be forgiven, without prejudice to the reſt by the impunity, it were beſt: if not, let the doublet be plucked off, and that part which may chaſtly lie naked, be ſtripped; let the number of ſtripes, according to the merits of his delinquency, be allotted, and the Boy brought before the face of his Maſter for ſeeing juſt execution. This is after the manner of the Hebrew judgement; the Malefactor was to lie down before the Judge, and ſo receive the ſtripes he appointed. Let one of the vileſt Boys then, he that hath behav'd himſelf worſt of any that day in the School, be picked out for executioner; which may ſerve for a ſhame and admonition to him, as for his fellow's ſuffering. If the Maſter will do it himſelf, it ſhall be reckoned onely to the ſeverity of his virtue; for ſo long as he may not lay his ſtripes any more on thoſe ſhameful parts, and he ſtays for the paſſing of judgment, till he is calm, there will be no fear any farther of thoſe extremities which have been uſed. For if there be not now twenty and twenty faults of ours obſerved or made by them, to bring us under their unclean ſtripes, unto one, that they would judge then worthy of their juſt ſeverity in a ſlow and chaſte puniſhment, we dare forfeit the benefit of this Petition.

'Theſe Premiſes therefore conſidered, we cannot but make our appeal, in this ſixteenth Century, and ſeventieth approaching year of the Chriſtian world, (ſeeing it hath not been done before) to the Heads of our nation, and to Cæſar, againſt this Obſcænum triſte, (if we may uſe JUVENAL's expreſſion) which hath been mentioned. That is, We humbly implore the Higher Powers, that this impure practice, which hath continued in our Schools hitherto, without controul or detection, (unleſs what hath been private only) may come under publick cenſure, and conſequently prohibition, and extermination; as a thing, if examined in the ſource and effects of it, not only what all know it, Malum triſte, but Malum turpe, and an iniquity to be puniſhed by the Judges.'

In a ſpare leaf of the book the Owner has wri[tten] theſe words: 'Contrary to the common uſe of th[e] 'is the cuſtom of S. Paul's ſchool, ever ſince the [time] 'of Dr. Gale, afterwards Dean of York; the [Boys]

' cane being introduced by a moſt modeſt man, the rev.
' Mr. Poſtlethwait, and ſtill continued to this time.'

'We hear that by the Queen's appointment, Joſhua 'Ward, Eſq; and eight or ten perſons, who in extraor-'dinary Caſes have receiv'd great benefit by taking his 'remedies, attended at the Court at Kenſington on mon-'day night laſt, and his patients were examin'd before 'her Majeſty by three eminent ſurgeons, ſeveral perſons 'of quality being preſent, when her Majeſty was graci-'ouſly pleas'd to order money to be diſtributed amongſt 'the patients, and congratulated Mr. Ward on his great 'ſucceſs. DA. June 10.

This paragraph mentions eight or ten perſons, who had receiv'd great benefit by taking his Remedies, as attending at Kenſington; but upon the ſtricteſt enquiry we can hear of no more than ſeven.

The firſt was a perſon, who, having a violent rheumatiſm, had been a good while in the Infirmary at Hyde-park corner, where, he ſaid, that he had undergone moſt rigorous Practice, without receiving any benefit; but by taking Mr. W's medicines he had been perfectly cured.

The Second was one, who ſay'd he had received extraordinary benefit in his ſight; who might have added, in his hearing and ſmelling too; of both which the company were as proper judges as of the other.

The two next were afflicted with the ſtone, and by her Majeſty's order had been ſent from Mr. Chiſelden to Mr. W's Hoſpital above five months ago, for the tryal of the efficacy of his medicines in diſſolving the ſtone; which he had declared he believed they would effect in two months time. All they ſay'd was, That they were much eaſier; which in all probability they would have been ſolely from the reſt which they had had, they being both men who uſed to get their living by their labour. But as they owned, that each of them had ſtill a ſtone or ſtones in his bladder, it was thought proper for them to return to Mr. W's Hoſpital, for a longer trial.

The Fifth was a woman, the wife of Mr. W's carpenter, in whoſe name an Affidavit had been publiſhed ſome time ſince, in ſeveral News-papers, concerning the great benefit ſhe had received. This woman had been ſearched by Mr. Cradock, who found ſhe had a ſtone, before ſhe tried Mr. W's medicines. She ſay'd ſhe had been ſo bad, that ſhe could not bear that a perſon ſhould walk croſs the room: but being asked, how ſhe got to the Hoſpital, (a mile and a half diſtance through the rougheſt part of the Town) ſhe anſwered, In a coach. She now declared herſelf to be well, and that ſhe had been ſo for five months: tho' we have very good evidence, that ſhe has had a fit of the ſtone within ſix weeks; concerning which ſhe was asked but abſolutely denied that ſhe had had any ſuch a fit. J W. being asked, Whether he himſelf did really believe, that the ſtone was diſſolved and brought away, after much heſitation, anſwered, That he could not ſay it was. To prove whether it was or not, ſhe was deſired to permit herſelf to be ſearch'd again; but ſhe abſolutely refuſed. The Surgeon who performed that operation asked her, if it gave her any pain; and ſhe owned it did not: which made her obſtinate refuſal ſeem the more ſtrange. To juſtifie which, it was ſay'd for her, That as ſhe was eaſy, and the operation by moving the ſtone might give her a return of pain, it was the beſt way to decline it; and that this was a cure, tho' the ſtone was not diſſolved or come away.

The Sixth was a man, who had a bottle with ſome gravel in it, which, he ſay'd, was brought from him by Mr. W's medicines. A gentleman of high rank, who had been much afflicted with gravel himſelf, asked him ſeveral queſtions; by his anſwers to which it appeared, that he had never had the gravel, and that his diſtemper had in all probability been only a rheumatiſm.

The ſeventh and laſt was a little, weakly, crooked woman, who ſay'd ſhe had been cured of a Wolf in her ſtomach. This Wolf ſhe ſay'd, had ſuch a ravenous appetite, or had occaſioned ſuch a one in her, that ſhe had eaten two legs of mutton raw, with a quarter of a peck of potatoes, and drank two pails of beer at a meal, or at a time; but upon taking Mr. W's medicines, the Wolf, or creature in her ſtomach, fell down flap into her belly; ever ſince which ſhe had been very well.

Seven wonderful Cures.

One felt his ſharp rheumatic pains no more:
A Second ſaw much better than before:
Three cur'd of ſtone, a dire diſeaſe much ſadder,
Who ſtill, 'tis thought, have each a ſtone in bladder:
A Sixth brought gravel bottled up and cork'd,
Which Drop and Pill, he ſay'd, by urine work'd;
But Queſtions, ask'd the Patient, all unravell'd;
Much more than whom the Doctor then was gravell'd.
The laſt a little Woman but great glutton,
Who at one meal eat two raw legs of mutton:
Nor wonder, ſince within her ſtomach lay
A Wolf, that gap'd for victuals night and day:
But when he ſmelt the Pill, he ſtrait for ſhelter
Run flap into her belly helter skelter.

HAVING received a particular account of what paſſed at Kenſington on Monday June 7. we thought proper to preſent it to the Publick, as a comment neceſſary to illuſtrate the ſhort relation of this tranſaction, publiſhed in the Daily Advertiſer June 10.

'We hear that by the Queen's appointment, Joſhua 'Ward, Eſq; and eight or ten perſons, who in extraor-'dinary Caſes have receiv'd great benefit by taking his 'remedies, attended at the Court at Kenſington on mon-'day night laſt, and his patients were examin'd before 'her Majeſty by three eminent ſurgeons, ſeveral perſons 'of quality being preſent, when her Majeſty was graci-'ouſly pleas'd to order money to be diſtributed amongſt 'the patients, and congratulated Mr. Ward on his great 'ſucceſs. DA. June 10.

This paragraph mentions eight or ten perſons, who had receiv'd great benefit by taking his Remedies, as attending at Kenſington; but upon the ſtricteſt enquiry we can hear of no more than ſeven.

The firſt was a perſon, who, having a violent rheumatiſm, had been a good while in the Infirmary at Hyde-park corner, where, he ſaid, that he had undergone moſt rigorous Practice, without receiving any benefit; but by taking Mr. W's medicines he had been perfectly cured.

The Second was one, who ſay'd he had received extraordinary benefit in his ſight; who might have added, in his hearing and ſmelling too; of both which the company were as proper judges as of the other.

The two next were afflicted with the ſtone, and by her Majeſty's order had been ſent from Mr. Chiſelden to Mr. W's Hoſpital above five months ago, for the tryal of the efficacy of his medicines in diſſolving the ſtone; which he had declared he believed they would effect in two months time. All they ſay'd was, That they were much eaſier; which in all probability they would have been ſolely from the reſt which they had had, they being both men who uſed to get their living by their labour. But as they owned, that each of them had ſtill a ſtone or ſtones in his bladder, it was thought proper for them to return to Mr. W's Hoſpital, for a longer trial.

The Fifth was a woman, the wife of Mr. W's carpenter, in whoſe name an Affidavit had been publiſhed ſome time ſince, in ſeveral News-papers, concerning the great benefit ſhe had received. This woman had been ſearched by Mr. Cradock, who found ſhe had a ſtone, before ſhe tried Mr. W's medicines. She ſay'd ſhe had been ſo bad, that ſhe could not bear that a perſon ſhould walk croſs the room: but being asked, how ſhe got to the Hoſpital, (a mile and a half diſtance through the rougheſt part of the Town) ſhe anſwered, In a coach. She now declared herſelf to be well, and that ſhe had been ſo for five months: tho' we have very good evidence, that ſhe has had a fit of the ſtone within ſix weeks; concerning which ſhe was asked but abſolutely denied that ſhe had had any ſuch a fit. J W. being asked, Whether he himſelf did really believe, that the ſtone was diſſolved and brought away, after much heſitation, anſwered, That he could not ſay it was. To prove whether it was or not, ſhe was deſired to permit herſelf to be ſearch'd again; but ſhe abſolutely refuſed. The Surgeon who performed that operation asked her, if it gave her any pain; and ſhe owned it did not: which made her obſtinate refuſal ſeem the more ſtrange. To juſtifie which, it was ſay'd for her, That as ſhe was eaſy, and the operation by moving the ſtone might give her a return of pain, it was the beſt way to decline it; and that this was a cure, tho' the ſtone was not diſſolved or come away.

The Sixth was a man, who had a bottle with ſome gravel in it, which, he ſay'd, was brought from him by Mr. W's medicines. A gentleman of high rank, who had been much afflicted with gravel himſelf, asked him ſeveral queſtions; by his anſwers to which it appeared, that he had never had the gravel, and that his diſtemper had in all probability been only a rheumatiſm.

The ſeventh and laſt was a little, weakly, crooked woman, who ſay'd ſhe had been cured of a Wolf in her ſtomach. This Wolf ſhe ſay'd, had ſuch a ravenous appetite, or had occaſioned ſuch a one in her, that ſhe had eaten two legs of mutton raw, with a quarter of a peck of potatoes, and drank two pails of beer at a meal, or at a time; but upon taking Mr. W's medicines, the Wolf, or creature in her ſtomach, fell down flap into her belly; ever ſince which ſhe had been very well.

Seven wonderful Cures.

One felt his ſharp rheumatic pains no more:
A Second ſaw much better than before:
Three cur'd of ſtone, a dire diſeaſe much ſadder,
Who ſtill, 'tis thought, have each a ſtone in bladder:
A Sixth brought gravel bottled up and cork'd,
Which Drop and Pill, he ſay'd, by urine work'd;
But Queſtions, ask'd the Patient, all unravell'd;
Much more than whom the Doctor then was gravell'd.
The laſt a little Woman but great glutton,
Who at one meal eat two raw legs of mutton:
Nor wonder, ſince within her ſtomach lay
A Wolf, that gap'd for victuals night and day:
But when he ſmelt the Pill, he ſtrait for ſhelter
Run flap into her belly helter skelter.
